Safeguarding adults: a one-day course

Why is it difficult for vulnerable adults to disclose abuse?
What are the barriers that may prevent professionals recognising what is happening?
And
If they do suspect abuse do they know what to do?

It is essential that those who work with vulnerable adults have the opportunity to debate and discuss these, and many more questions in order to explore the complexity of safeguarding adults and to help them to approach their work with confidence and knowledge.

Through experience, knowledge and insight gathered over many years of working with both children and adults the Lucy Faithfull foundation can promote good practice and help colleagues to recognise risk and act to safeguard vulnerable adults with whom they work.

The course will provide knowledge about what is meant by the terms 'adult abuse', 'vulnerable adult', and 'significant harm'. It will identify the indicators of abuse and some of the factors associated with the perpetrator. It will help to understand why it is difficult for vulnerable adults to disclose abuse, and what barriers can prevent professional recognition of what is taking place.

This course also explores practice issues, attitudes and dilemmas for staff who provide adult personal care services to those who have a history of convicted or alleged offences such as domestic abuse, other violent offences, or sex offending,
